About the presenter

Meg Brunner, MLIS

has been a librarian at the University of Washington Alcohol & Drug Abuse Institute since obtaining her MLIS degree from the University of Washington in 1998. She has served as Chair of the professional society Substance Abuse Librarians & Information Specialists (SALIS) and is currently their newsletter editor. Some of the major projects she is involved in include the NIDA Clinical Trials Network (CTN), where she serves as a digital librarian for the CTN Dissemination Library, and the Northwest Addiction Technology Transfer Center (ATTC), where she focuses on information dissemination. Meg is the author of the ATTC Messenger's popular "Addiction Science Made Easy" column (focused on CTN research), and co-authored a paper for Contemporary Clinical Trials about the use of social media and other technologies in clinical trials which is currently being revised for 2020. She has expertise in information/media literacy, instructional design, and information organization and management.
